SECTION A: COMPREHENSION

Read the text below and answer the questions.

1. Social media can make or break your career. We've all heard at least one story of an employee getting fired over a Tweet or Facebook post. And when you apply for a job, most hiring managers will first turn to Google to vet your background and qualifications.

2. Whichever way you swing it, you can't avoid social media anymore and how you manage – or don't manage – your social presence can make or break your job hunt. It's time to take control of your image and start thinking of social media as personal branding.

3. It's important to be aware of your social presence and to take control of what you put out there. Recruiters aren't really searching for salacious details about your life. Most are looking to confirm that your skills and qualifications make you the best person for the job.

4. John Jersin, former Google executive and current CEO of Connectifier, says 'you should have updated and accurate information everywhere someone might look. It helps you look consistent and organised, but it also gives you an opportunity to briefly emphasise important parts of your resumé.'

5. And don't forget, just because hiring managers and recruiters might be checking your social profiles that doesn't mean you can't take a look at theirs. Learning more about the company you are hoping to work for as well as the hiring manager or recruiter, can better prepare you for an interview.

6. A study by CareerBuilder revealed that the top five things recruiters are looking for in your social profile, which include inappropriate photos, alcohol or drug use, negative posts about past employers or co-workers, a lack of communication skills as well as any discriminatory or inflammatory content regarding race, gender, religion and other issues.

7. 'Forty-eight percent of hiring managers who screen candidates via social networks said they've found information that caused them not to hire a candidate – down slightly from 51 percent last year,' according to CareerBuilder.

8. However, the survey also revealed what type of social content made recruiters move forward with a candidate. This included any background information that supported the candidate's qualifications, signs that the candidate's personality would be a good fit for the company, a professional image, strong communication skills and creativity.

9. Proving to recruiters that you can maintain professionalism on social media is a good sign that you will carry that over into your working life. 'Researching candidates via social media and other online sources has transformed from an emerging trend to a staple of online recruitment,' said Rosemary Haefner, chief human resources officer at CareerBuilder.

10 It's time to get smart about your social presence and view it as a personal brand, rather than a personal outlet.

IS YOUR SCHOOL A HAPPY SCHOOL?

-Richard Hayward-

'When the children are happy in your class, you'll be happy with the work that they do.' Those wise words were given to a student teacher when she asked the elderly grey-haired teacher her secret for getting her learners to do such good work.

Countless articles have been written on the reasons why South African children do so poorly in so many schools with many potential solutions offered. Could a core solution be that if there's a focus on the children and their teachers being happy to be at school, the improved results will follow?

Research done in 2016 by UNESCO (Unite Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation) identified five main factors present in a happy school. They were:

- Friendships and relationships in the school community
- Warm and friendly learning environment
- Learner freedom, creativity and engagement
- Teamwork and collaborative spirit
- Positive teacher attitudes and attributes

The researchers narrowed all the responses into three broad categories: people, process and place.

Every year the media provide an overload of news of both spectacular and shocking Grade 12 results. In the midst of this narrow media focus on academic performance, which are the schools where the children and staff are the happiest? Such schools are more deserving of being on the front pages of the newspapers and leading the seven o'clock TV evening news. Let's make our first priority, happy classrooms and happy schools. We will see positive results, both emotionally and academically.
