ADDENDUM A

HOW NOT TO FIND A JOB

In today's highly competitive job market, the hard work of finding and landing one's dream job can often lead to disappointment. However, understanding the issues that could raise a red flag over one's candidacy can stand you in good stead.

You have made an extra effort to complement your first qualification with another one to make you stand out from the crowd, and you have probably applied for many positions and been rejected. Now, finally, your CV is past the shortlisting phase and you may be tempted to feel that things are in the bag.

However, you still have to pass the interview hurdle, where you will be compared to others who will have similar qualifications and experience, so you need to put in that last bit of time and effort to make it count. There are several aspects that you should avoid to ensure that your chances for a successful interview are increased.

Companies look for fit during the interview to see which of the similar candidates will be best for them. Doing your research beforehand, about the company and how your experience will match their needs, will give you the confidence to shine under pressure.

It is important to know exactly where the interview will take place and thereafter determine how you are going to get there on time. Plan to get there with at least 30 minutes to spare.

While you might be tempted to stand out and showcase your uniqueness, you still need to ensure that what you wear fits the culture of both the company and the job. If uncertain of the dress culture, choose the formal option.

It is important to be positive even if the reason you are looking for a new position is that your previous employer was terrible. Even if you had a really bad experience with your previous position or boss, try to find the positives and highlight these.

Few people have a spotless past with no wobbles. Be honest and positive about what happened and what you learnt, should you be expected to explain some issues or gaps during the interview. Do not claim to have qualifications or experience that you do not have. If you are still completing a course, do not pretend you already completed it.

Candidates should ensure that their phones are switched off during the interview as nothing is more important than the task at hand. A phone ringing at that time will certainly cost you a job.

When asked whether you would like to drink something, it is good to settle for a glass of water. Spills and crumbs from eating snacks can create an impression.

It is important to prepare what you will say to demonstrate that you are able to handle challenges, stress and conflicts in the workplace. You need to present examples from your past on how you have handled challenging situations.

Ultimately, people want to appoint people they think will be a pleasure to work with. Handling your interview with confidence and good humour is sure to make you stand out from the crowd.
