Question 1: Comprehension

From transporting presidents to flying an airbus

The journey of Pilot Refilwe Moreetsi

- 1 Refilwe Moreetsi was seven years old when she first set foot on a plane. "It was during a family trip to Durban," she fondly recalls, as we chat on the phone. Born and raised in Tzaneen in the Limpopo province, Refilwe is the youngest of four children. Her father had a passion for travel and loved sharing that with his family.
- 2 After that flight to Durban in 1994, Refilwe's mind was made up - she was going to be an airline pilot. Although her parents gave her incredible support, her real challenges began outside of the family.
- 3 Refilwe eased her way into university, turning down a full bursary to study Mining Engineering at the University of Pretoria, and enrolling for Wits' Aeronautical Engineering programme. However, she could not shake the feeling that she needed to be up in the air, so one week before driving to Johannesburg to start, she opted out with the full backing of her mother.
- 4 "I learnt later on that in the air force you go through basic training. It's about two years of training before you can actually fly." Her time in the air force led to her eventually flying the Oryx helicopter, the largest helicopter in the military. This brought many once-in-a-lifetime experiences her way. At the helm of this aircraft, she participated in flood relief, firefighting and search and rescue missions. The Oryx is also used to transport the president, deputy president and other VIPs.
- 5 "At the time when I was in the air force, I had flown President Cyril Ramaphosa when he was deputy president, and I've flown Jacob Zuma," Refilwe reveals. "Normally, their jet would land somewhere, but then they would need to go out to a village or to a school or to a community. We fly them from the airport to that area. The first time it was so unreal, I'm literally flying number one of the country, and then you get to meet them, and you're like, 'Oh! wow, this is my life.' And then you land and wait for them to finish with whatever they're doing and then they come back."

- 6 After leaving the air force, Refilwe eventually earned her Airline Transport Pilot Licence. Today she is a senior First Officer with South African Airways (SAA), flying the Airbus A320.
- 7 Despite the negativity that has been showered upon her for being a black female pilot, Refilwe also notes the positives, telling me that young, black females reach out to her often on social media for advice. "The nice thing is now, landing from a flight, you get some people who come to the flight deck to say "hi" or take pictures and stuff, and they'll be amazed that it's a woman flying the aircraft. When it's a child, you can see that they're so inspired by this."

Question 2: Language Structures and Conventions

The father of vaccinations

Edward Jenner (1749 – 1823)

- 1 Edward Jenner was an English doctor who discovered vaccination. The major interest in his life from the time he first began to study medicine was to discover a means of preventing smallpox.
- 2 During the 18th century, smallpox was one of the main threats to life. Frequent epidemics would occur, and thousands of people died.
- 3 In Gloucestershire, where Jenner lived, there were many stories that people who had once caught cowpox, a harmless disease, did not appear to get smallpox.
- 4 In 1796, when the next outbreak of cowpox occurred, Jenner began to experiment. He extracted the fluid from the cowpox sore on the hand of a dairymaid and injected it into a healthy eight-year-old boy. The boy developed cowpox, and two months after this Jenner took the vital step. He injected fluids infected with smallpox into the boy, who afterwards showed no sign of becoming ill.
- 5 Although Jenner performed several more successful experiments with vaccinations, it took several years before the medical world was convinced. However, his work was finally accepted, and Jenner, set to work to vaccinate thousands of people. This led to a very significant decrease in the number of cases of smallpox. Parliament granted Jenner large sums of money for his research.
- 6 Jenner became celebrated throughout the world. Many honours were awarded to him, but he preferred a quiet life, and returned home to continue work as a local doctor. Before he died, he had the satisfaction of seeing smallpox overcome.

PEER PRESSURE CAN BE GOOD

You already know that teen years can be tough. You are still learning many things about yourself. When you go through challenges, it can be a good thing to experience them with your friends.

Socialising with different groups of peers like your classmates or teammates can help you to see how people face challenges. It is not advisable for teenagers to be on their own, especially when they have problems.

Everyone within a circle of friends with positive influence is different. This helps you to gain new experiences, like when your friends play a new sport. You can offer your support by watching the game with them.

Peers can have a strong positive influence on each other and play an important role in each other's lives in many ways. In a group of peers, you can find friendship, acceptance and role models, a circle within which you can build strong, lasting bonds. Sometimes it is good to identify the traits you want to imitate from your role models.

When you are in a group of friends, you have peers to encourage you to work harder, for example when you help each other with homework and studying. Friends can set positive examples, like a friend who does well in school. This can encourage you to set goals for yourself and do your best.

Peers can help you make decisions too; your friends will quickly tell you when you are making a mistake or doing something risky. This usually assists you to avoid making mistakes and to stay away from trouble.

No matter what you go through, it is good to have peers that have a positive influence on you.
